Sam Baker, the owner of Bakers Boot Co., the company that made the boot that was put on President Barack Obama's foot by the Secret Service on Friday, has been determined to have a clear record of fiscal responsibility, according to reports from Ohio. Baker's record was examined as part of a two-year project, financed by the Ohio General Assembly, which received $70,000 from the General Fund and an additional $50,000 from the Jobs and the Economy Initiative Fund. ADVERTISEMENT The study found that Baker had made $2.4 million in federal income tax payments, a notable savings compared to the amount he would have owed had he been on the payroll. Baker, who founded the boot company in 1977, filed for bankruptcy protection twice before and was reportedly in a $12 million hole. After the second bankruptcy, in 2003, he emerged with a net worth of $700,000. According to the report, Baker has been cited for tax evasion and for misleading IRS agents about the company's finances. He has also been a longstanding opponent of attempts to balance the state budget, refusing to contribute any money for his own self-funded pension and claiming that the debt is not his responsibility. In the same report, an accountant who reviewed the company's finances after Baker's bankruptcy said that the company never made its payments because the business wasn't profitable. Baker continued to operate the company even after losing $80,000 in 2005, according to the report. Baker's most recent filing with the Ohio Secretary of State reported that he was up to his neck in debt, and his most recent personal federal tax return shows that the company declared a loss of $240,000 in the 2005 tax year. The report concluded that Baker had "not demonstrated either a commitment to fiscal responsibility or a willingness to accept blame for his failures."
